

The Growth

Growth - it is a necessity of all things in life. Every being that lives or has lived has experienced growth in one way or another. This is especially true for people. People grow not only in the physical sense, but also in an expansion of knowledge. My abilities as a writer have grown exponentially, with my original inconsistency having now become a much more stable style.

At the beginning of the year, I was unable to carry any sort of style between essays. My first essay of the year "An Analysis of The Road" showed excellent use of diction, but lacked in every other area. The subsequent essay, "Man and Literature," shows better use of structure, but at the cost of the previously good diction. This trade-off was caused by a lack of consistency within my writing. This inconsistency is also shown in the individual essays themselves. None of the earlier essays show proper flow or syntax.

As time progressed, however, my style began to develop, bringing a sense of consistency to my work. The flow began to improve, and the areas I'm strong in and weak in have become more apparent throughout my modern essays. My use of persuasive elements and diction have steadily improved over the year, and were especially strong in one of my most recent essays, "The Viability of the Merchant."

The steady improvement in my abilities as a writer are easy to see upon inspection of my essays over the year. Through the development of my style, I was able to provide consistency to my essays, immensely improving my abilities as a writer. Even with the weaknesses I still have, I have become a much stronger writer and will continue to as time continued to progress.
